The IDA Emerging Architectural Design of the Year Winners Announced
The 17th edition of the International Design Awards (IDA) attracted thousands of outstanding submissions from designers around the world who vied for the top prizes in this prestigious award. Evaluating submissions from almost 80 countries, members of the IDA jury commented on the incredibly high standard of design entries across the five award disciplines – Architecture, Interior, Product, Graphic and Fashion Design.

Yao Dai from LuXun Academy of Fine Arts and Design took home the prize of ‘Emerging Architectural Design of the Year’ with PURE which is a pioneering solution to address Singapore’s fresh water scarcity. PURE employs photovoltaic panels positioned on water surfaces to collect distilled water and save energy by regulating wind speed and water evaporation. By leveraging the complementary relationship between water and photovoltaics, PURE delivers economic and environmental benefits. It offers a sustainable way of producing fresh water, while generating clean energy. Furthermore, it enriches the meaning of the clean energy industry by demonstrating the potential of integrating multiple functions into a single system.
